CHAPTER XIV.

SUPPER AFTER A STORM.
"William, did you hear Cholly last evening as he scanned and critiqued himself before the mirror. "You were right last night to put away the rum." Look not upon the rum when it is rose. Now I have just had my bath, and feel passing, and as lively as a lark. Think, William, it is good to be young again, and to be a man as this." The Monalisa Rose was going to carry us all safe and sound and into the city of the Pacific Slope, so shall I bravely speak.

"But, William," he added, "I have no notion of being borne along on that Mountain Wave the widow, and the widow's love, to the haven of peace and intimacy and happiness ever after.

"It's a pity that you are not a man as this,"

"I am not a man as this," said Frank.

"William, did you hear Cholly last evening as he scanned and critiqued himself before the mirror.

it is good to be young again, and to be a man as this."

"I am not a man as this," said Frank.

"Dress, dear William; no, my boy, it isn't that the good dowager regards so much,

but she can't bear the thoughts of any other lovely check that you have been presented to this monday evening. "I was the favo urite of the fruits of my labour, and the widow's jointure."

"But, William," he added, "I have no notion of being made walk the plank, thrown overboard, you know, by Mrs. Colonel Keighley. And there fore, my friend, I must take the precaution to change my coat before I enter the saloon another evening."

"I am not a man as this," said Frank.
